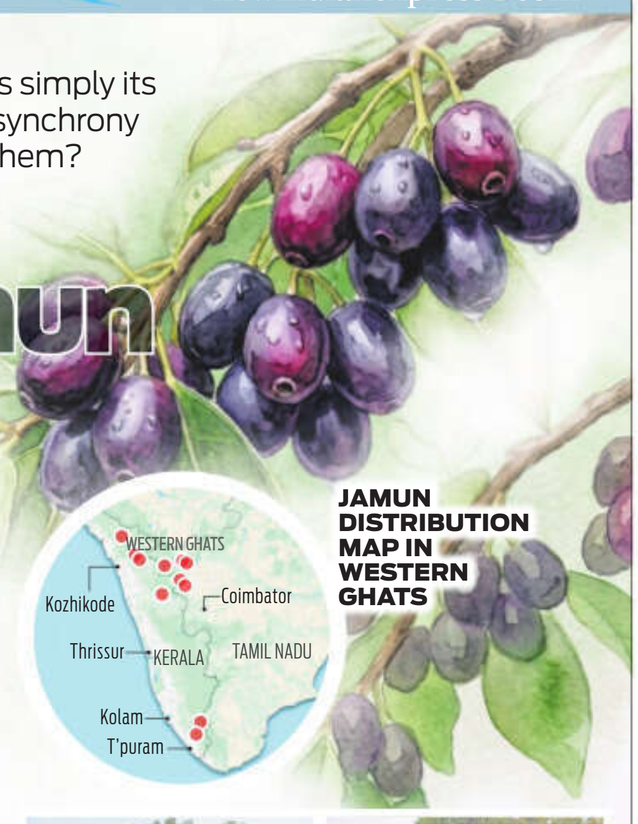
Did the Nilgiri wild jamun fail to flower because this was simply its natural resting year or are the trees beginning to lose synchrony with the climate and the pollinators that sustain them?

WHERE DID THE 'ENDANGERED' Nilgiri wild jamun DISAPPEAR?



JAMUN DISTRIBUTION MAP IN WESTERN GHATS

(L-R) K Manigandan and B Subbaiyan

SV KRISHNA CHAITANYA @ Nilgiris

THE journey to one of Tamil Nadu's remotest forests begins where most roads end. A four-wheel vehicle took us till Parsons Valley and from there, we went on a bike to the Western Catchment Area. The last stretch had to be covered on foot, trekking through steep slopes at elevations above 2,000 metre.

After hours of travel in bone-crushing cold, mist and strong winds, we finally reached the hill slopes where hundreds of Nilgiri wild jamun (Syzygium calophyllifolium) grow. But there was something missing.

I could not find even one ripened Nilgiri wild jamun, although the fruiting season has almost come to a close. We searched hundreds of trees. Forget about fruiting, we did not see even the flowering. Stunted budding was noticed in just a few trees.

For a tree that the IUCN Red List has already classified as Endangered, the absence was difficult to ignore.

The 2023 IUCN assessment estimates that there are fewer than 700 mature individuals of Syzygium calophyllifolium left in the wild, spread across just 13 subpopulations in five montane landscapes. The population is declining. The Nilgiri and Agasthyamalai landscapes together account for 72% of the species' population, making the high-altitude forests of the Nilgiris particularly important for its survival.

The IUCN assessment says the species is chiefly found in montane evergreen forests, generally between 1,000 metre and 2,300 metre, and has an estimated area of occupancy of just 56 sq km. It records a continuing decline in mature individuals as well as in the area, extent and quality of its habitat. So this was not merely the absence of fruit. It was the silence of an ecological event that simply never happened or observed so far. Whether this is a cyclical phenomenon or whether something more serious is at play remains a question.

Is it linked to warmer years, El Nino years or poor monsoon? Incidentally, 2026 is one of the warmest years and a super El Nino is currently taking shape. The area also experienced unprecedented ground frost before the fruiting season. Could that have affected the trees? Could changing weather conditions have affected pollinators? And if the flowering and fruiting cycle is disrupted repeatedly, what happens to the animals that depend upon the tree? The IUCN itself lists February to May as the species' flowering and fruiting period. Phenology - the timing of flowering, fruiting and other recurring biological events - is increasingly recognised as a sensitive indicator of environmental change. Scientists say plant reproductive cycles are influenced by environmental cues and are often synchronised with pollinators and seed dispersers.

M G Ganesan, former director of Project Nilgiri Tahr and current deputy director of Mudumalai Tiger Reserve, says Mukurthi National Park is a prime habitat for Tamil Nadu's state animal Nilgiri Tahr.

"One of the two metapopulations of Nilgiri Tahr is in Western Catchment Area and this landscape that primarily consists of montane shola forests is very fragile. Nilgiri wild jamun is an indicator species of ecological health and found only in this ancient shola landscape. Every year, it is customary for me to visit there and relish eating the fruit, but this year I haven't seen a single tree with the fruits. This is not confined to western catchment alone, but observed in the entire Nilgiris landscape."

Climate clock falls out of sync

For anti-poaching watcher G Arun Kumar, who has worked in the Western Catchment Area for the last 10 years, the absence of flowering this year is striking. He said there was no flowering and felt that the poor monsoon, high winds and heavy misty conditions could have a direct correlation with the failure. "Climate change is affecting the forest," he said, pointing to the changing conditions being experienced in the high-altitude landscape. But scientists caution that one year's failure cannot automatically be attributed to climate change.

Anita Varghese, director (biodiversity), Keystone Foundation, said many trees that produce fruits in abundance, such as amla and mango, have a resting period after mass flowering and fruiting. Nilgiris wild jamun could also show such a phenomenon.

"That could be the phenomenon," she said, while stressing that the trees need to be observed again next year. If the failure repeats, climate stress could become a stronger possibility, particularly because this year had poor rainfall. Anita said the relationship between climate and flowering can also involve a time lag. A drought or rainfall deficit in one year may affect flowering in the following year. "This year's drought will reflect on next year's flowering," she said. That makes the next flowering season particularly important. Anita also stressed the need for regular monitoring because phenological changes can be subtle but important indicators of climate change. She noted that changes of even a couple of weeks in the timing of flowering can have ecological consequences.

Renee Maria Borges, evolutionary biologist and professor at the Centre for Ecological Sciences, Indian Institute of Science, Bengaluru, says it would be because of climate change. "We are seeing such disruptions across the world, but without long-term studies it would be difficult to draw conclusions." According to field personnel who have worked in Mukurthi for several years, fruiting has generally been observed every year.
